“The Joy of the Saints

The joy of the saint transcends that of all other men. Inevitably, he is as his divine Lord was, a man of sorrows. But the joy of all other men, and the glory of all other loves, is as pale as the flame of a candle in the sunlight, beside the joy of the saint on earth. For his life is the experience in his own soul of the unutterable bliss of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit in their knowing and loving one another.

When Christ bowed his head and slept the sleep of consummated love, deep in the black bowl of the darkest night arose the morning star. And when he came forth out of the tomb to the splendor of his risen life, Christ came forth to ascend to his Father; the dawn of everlasting day had come silently upon earth, the spring of immortal life had put forth its flower unnoticed. The shame and sorrow of Christ with the guilt of the whole world upon him had been seen by the eyes of the world, but the exquisite secret of the first breath of his risen life was kept. He went up to his Father and sent the Paraclete to flood the heart of man with his risen life.

When the saint awakens from that dark night of love in which self has died, he too comes forth, he too knows the wonder of the Trinity in himself. Christ has risen in him, Christ is formed in him, the Holy Spirit descends upon him and his life is the breath of the Spirit of love. Sanctity is man's integrity, the fullness and the wholeness of his humanity; in it suffering and joy are one thing, love and love is Christ.
